The Journey Plan

Warsaw

© January 24, 2014 Suncetegorized

Day 2, and the first "glitch" in the plant Boarding the overnight train from Cologne, I could not find "carriage 180" which is where my reserved sleeping car was! In the middle of total confusion by the train attendants, it transpires that 180 was not connected, for some obscure technical reason!! Initially my heart sank as I thought of the overnight journey in a regular seat, but then I was put into a "couchette" which has 6 berths! I remember them from student days! It turns out they only put two of in, so in the end it was ok, but not what either of us has booked! My companion, I'll call him Michael (his real Polish name I could never pronounce, let alone spell) was a 40-year old engineer from near Poznam, Poland, who has worked for Phillips Lighting for 20 years. His English was fluent, and he was great company, we had wide-ranging discussions especially about Polish people claiming Child Allowance in the UK for their family back home (he's for that) and claiming benefits even if they don't speak English (he's very against that!). Phillips, and their suppliers etc, employ about half the population (60,000) of his town. That must be very scary for them, but he thinks they (Phillips) are committed to staying there. I hope so.

So on to Warsaw, and I have 4 hours to explore before my 4pm train for Moscow. Taking two trams to reach the Old Town area I am now having lunch....

The Old town is really beautiful. It is not old though, it has all been rebuilt, 100% of it, since 1944 when it was totally destroyed by bombing. Completed in 1962, it's now a World Heritage site. I'd like to spend a lot more time here – perhaps we will some day – it's still been worth a quick look around!

The photo is of the nearby Royal Castle, reconstructed between 1971 and 1984 at a huge cost. It originally dated from the 14th century.
